Promptings

How do Christians measure success in life?

At our worst, we settle for culturally conditioned measurements. These usually include climbing the ladder in social and business settings, accumulating and spending money, insulating ourselves as much as possible from pain and loss, winning, and taking care of those we consider members of our particular tribe.

At our best, though, we pursue goals defined by the deeds and words of Jesus. Most of these run counter to culture. We measure success in terms of how well we seek God's direction, practice unselfish service to others, engage in worship, preserve and manage God's creation, expand and build community, and nurture the image of God within us.

Let's slow down, take inventory of our decisions and actions, and ask ourselves: "How do I measure success in life?"
